(This is a response to the video that was shown on the official Spotify blog today with the following disclaimer: "For additional details, please refer to the Spotify Terms of Use", although they never explicitly state this.) The main exception to this are the ways which Spotify has made available for developers to integrate Spotify into their own software, by way of the following open source projects: a) libspotify (a library for access to Spotify data) b) libspotify-connect (a library for building Spotify desktop clients) c) libspotify-c (a library for building Spotify desktop clients using C) Since libspotify-c is a C library, and not a Java API, there is absolutely no way for a Java application to access Spotify's data. You would therefore need to use one of the C libraries for Java to access Spotify's data. The easiest way to do this would be to use libspotify-c, which is a pure C library, and therefore doesn't require you to use a JVM (e.g. the JRE and JDK) on your machine. However, the obvious problem with libspotify-c is that it requires libspotify.lib, which by itself requires f678ea9f9e
